J. M. LILE. Judge Kibbey yesterday rendered an important decision in the case of Pinal and Maricopa counties vs. the Phonix & Maricopa railroad company. Masten refused to pay taxes on the line that is laid across the Pima Indians reservation, claiming that the counties had no authority to assess a road across such a reservation. Judge Kibbey's decision is logical and sensible, the Judge holding that the railroad must pay, reasoning that the road could be sued for damages resulting from injury on such reserve, and the Hunsaker, of San Diego, who has a company could sue and collect for hauling freight across the reservation, hence it must be governed by the same rules as the balance of the easement newspaper men of the Territory. Much has been said in past seasons by the various agricultural writers about the work of potato diggers. Most of what was said referred to the expensive machines that are beyond the reach of and Arizona. When it is remembered the small growers. Rural New Yorker has of late held corresponde farmers who use potato plows of various designs. These tools are made and sold under different patents, though they all work on essentially the same principle. The potatoes are thrown out of the ground by means of a contrivance like two plows, one right and the other left, ced together so as to throw the earth in both directions. Above these plows are fastened long bars. The earth is to fall through the bars, while the potatoes are supposed to roll off to the ground.
